Headline: Verizon-MCI Combo Better For Customers, National Security

The agreement to join Verizon and MCI creates the best possible partnership, but a Qwest/MCI combination could result in less investment in MCI's networks and Internet backbone, and harm national security-related customers and the long-term interest of large businesses, government agencies, consumers and shareholders. That's what Tom Tauke, executive vice president - Public Affairs, Policy and Communications, told telecommunications leaders Monday at the annual Emerging Issues Policy Forum in Florida. He said Qwest's attempt to acquire MCI is not in the public interest. Verizon has estimated we will invest approximately $3 billion, primarily in MCI's Internet backbone, network and systems, which serve large customers around the globe, including the U.S. Defense and Homeland Security departments. The cash-strapped Qwest has made no such commitment to invest and could decide to channel Internet traffic onto its own network, potentially removing a backbone competitor.
