It's been a very busy week of transition planning for our proposed merger, so I thought I'd take a moment to show everyone a bit of detail of all that work from my point of view.

First was a disruption planning summit which was held this Tuesday and Wednesday. People from customer and operating departments in both airlines came and discussed ways to improve our customer service during off-schedule operations. Part of the exercise involved all of us writing down our desires for the future on sticky notes. The photo shows how many different ideas we came up with:

We grouped all of these ideas into things to work on going forward. There are some things US Airways does today I think is pretty cool, and American's auto re-accommodation tool will be great to have at the combined airline. So we will work to come up with the best of both airlines to better serve our customers.

Then we held a huge meeting on Thursday and Friday of all of the leaders (over 250 of us!) working on the integration. Our first such meeting was in Phoenix in early April, and this was the next time we've all come together. All of the teams reported on our plans to move forward quickly when/if we receive merger approval.

Our focus is on giving our customers the benefit of the strength of the new American as quickly as possible. Although it will take months, and in some cases, years, for our integration to be complete, we want our customers to start to feel the value of our merger upon approval.

We have over a thousand initiatives, with over 6000 action items, identified to meet these goals. The next few months will be very busy, and I would expect that we'll all be having lots of training in the coming weeks to prepare for day 1, when the new American rises!
