Express Scripts-Medco Definitive Merger (ESInet article links to video)

Bloomberg: It is the second biggest merger deal of the year.

CNBC: Express Scripts to buy Medco.

KMOV: The deal is worth almost $30 billion in cash.

CNBC: $71.36 a share in cash and stock.

Bloomberg: It is the biggest deal among pharmacy benefit managers in at least a decade.

Bloomberg: This is a highly synergistic deal. There's purchasing leverage, supply chain savings, corporate overhead reductions—all really good for this company. It does not surprise me to see both of these names trading higher this morning.

CNBC: Investors seem to be agreeing with that too.

Mad Money (CNBC): This is how the two, along with rival CVS/Caremark, are currently trading.

Mad Money (CNBC): With the potential acquire, they gained a quick seven points right before your eyes. I kept hitting it up, I couldn't believe it.

CNBC: By putting these companies together, they will ultimately be able to produce lower pharmaceutical costs for consumers.

CNBC: Do you think it's going to cut costs for the consumer, for us, Eugene? I do not have a doubt. PBMs have a proven track record of taking costs out of the healthcare system. I want to say over the last decade, it has removed several hundred billion dollars of healthcare costs.

CNBC: So this is a consolidation of two extremely similar businesses. It's a horizontal play.

Mad Money (CNBC): It's a testament to how deals can really make a difference and that companies can use their cash, their borrowing power and their stock to change their own destiny.

Bloomberg: The competitive dynamics just got ratcheted up a notch. I would expect that the purchasing power that Medco and Express Scripts get together will really rival what CVS can do.

Mad Money (CNBC): You own either one, you win.

Larry Zarin, senior vice president & chief marketing officer, Express Scripts: For us to be able to come and keep our chin up, our chest out and to be able to grow this organization while really bringing social good to the United States.
